A philosophical view of virtual reality

In this paper, we analyze the virtual reality from a philosophical point of view. The epistemological aspect, as a reflection on what the objective reality is, helps us to understand what should be a model of it, which is called the "virtual reality". Similar to the real world, its model should be an artificial world that allows us to explore it in an interactive manner according to our will to make our representations. The moral aspect is a reflection on the "morality" imposed on us during our existence in this virtual reality. We need that our representations of this artificial world would be just, in order to find out a place to exist there. The just is what is adjusted, or conforms, to the order of this artificial world that sometimes requires to harm others. The aspect of finality or meaning of life in the real world, is the question of behavior towards everything related to the irreversible of which the death is one of the crucial points. It is different for a virtual reality where there eliminated the idea of irreversible changes.
